When I interviewed social media!
Well, I started my journey roughly two decades back and see where the human impulse to communicate has taken me. I have evolved from being a background character in entertainment to a fully integrated part of nearly every aspect of daily life. With the power to dominate all, I'm drawing you to a perfect illusionistic world. The question is—are people more better on me than real life?

In my career, I've got a good experience of human psychology—people are more what they hide than they show. Since you can't fake perfection in real life, I offer a space where you can. The filters change you into a more pleasing version of yourself. Maintaining a streak on Snapchat makes you feel happy as a reward of success. My vibrant content keeps you all engaged for copious amounts of time. You species are more relied to other people's opinions—the validation you seek from peers—the number of likes you receive, the more valuable you are.

Am I doing more harm than good? Well, as humans are hardwired for negativity, if you see a post and compare your own lives to it, conclude that it doesn't measure up. Following, you start to doubt your self-worth and result is what we say ANXIETY. I give you a giant paradox—a plethora of choices, making it harder for to find the three viable ones. I'll continue to evolve at lightning speed, it'll be tricky for you to predict which way I'll morph next. Maybe one day you'll be completely disconnected from the real world.
